Pomeroy State Park is an undeveloped and unmarked Connecticut state park located in the town of Lebanon just south of Willimantic . Established around 1955 on the estate of Charles Pomeroy , the park has grown to be 200 acres in total , but lacks an entrance or parking . Activities in the park include hiking and hunting with bows . The park is accessed by parking off the roadside of Connecticut Route 289 .

= History =

Located on the top of Bush Hill , south of Hosmer Mountain , Pomeroy State Park that is named for Charles Pomeroy , a textile manufacturer . The park preserves a forested area that shares a boundary with preserved farmland . The natural setting of the park is undisturbed by development of even an entrance to the park . The park consists of 200 acres of land , of which 90 acres were previously part of the Pomeroy estate before the establishment of the state park . Established circa 1955 , the park was listed as containing 99 acres in the Connecticut State Register and Manual . The park limits expanded to 104 acres by 1963 .

= Activities =

Pomeroy State Park is an undeveloped and unmarked park that has hunting and hiking activities for visitors . According to the Oh , Ranger ! website , the park does not have any listed or established trails for hiking and hunting is restricted to bow hunting . A 2005 property designation map from the Connecticut Department of Environmental Protection uses a portion of the Willimantic Quadrangle map to show the hilly terrain on the northeast portion of the park and the top of Bush Hill to the northwest . The southern limits of the part are also hilly with a steeper elevation change at the edge of the southwest boundary .

Joseph Leary , author of A Shared Landscape , noted that it is unlikely that this park could be developed because parking is limited to the roadside of Connecticut Route 289 . The Town of Lebanon 's website confirms that the park has no entrance and parking is restricted to the roadside of the highway .
